EMOTIONS ARE running high on both sides of a controversy over the "tractor for freedom" campaign. Those who support the deal proposed by Fidel Castro—release of 1214 prisoners taken in the disastrous April 17 invasion in return for 500 heavy tractors—are appealing to powerful feelings of humanitarianism.

Those who oppose the deal are invoking the intense distaste Americans feel toward submission to blackmail.

Largely overlooked in the impassioned appeals for and against the huge fund-raising campaign are the probable implications and rewards of the deal.

failure of the invasion—was the lesson that the proxy intervention was wrong in concept, or was it how to do it better next time? The reply was: "We learned how to do it better next time."

The Administration has given no indication that it takes seriously the wide spread criticism that the CIA worked mainly with the conservative and aristocratic refugee elements and shut out the liberal elements who favored Castro's revolution until he turned it over to the Communists.

vent the massive anti-Castro uprising inside Cuba that was hoped for as a key part of the CIA plan.

FOR THE SAME reasons, installing the same "freedom fighters" once more in Miami can help Castro convince the Cubans that they are threatened by a reactionary, pro-Batista force intent only on turning back the clock.

As for the propaganda value of accepting Castro's proposal, State Department officials take much encouragement from newspaper editorials in Latin America. These are the same newspapers that led the same officials to hope for sanctions against Castro by the Organization of American States until Brazil, Mexico and Ecuador threw cold water on this prospect.

The hopeful view of the tractor deal is that it is portraying Castro as a monster who trades human lives for machines. Another possibility is that the trade will make Castro appear to be a reasonable man.
